Michigan's Interlochen Center for the Arts is poised to announce the inaugural class of NY Phil Interlochen Scholars: 30 New York youth who have been chosen to attend Interlochen Arts Camp on full-tuition scholarships this summer. Their names will be announced during Interlochen's upcoming appearance at New York's Lincoln Center on March 3. Titled MUKTI: A Movement of Liberation, the program opens with the school's world premiere performance of a collaboratively created piece combining original music, song, poetry, spoken word, dance and film to celebrate international liberation movements throughout history. Also featuring music by living Black composers, as interpreted by the young musicians of the Interlochen Arts Academy Orchestra and members of the New York Philharmonic, the concert marks a high point of Interlochen's ongoing partnership with the eminent professional orchestra.

World premiere of new multidisciplinary work celebrating liberation

The program's opening half comprises the world premiere performance of ■■■■■■ : MUKTI. Named for the Hindi word for liberation, one of the four themes of the Philharmonic's 2022-23 season, this new multidisciplinary piece was collaboratively created by students from all seven of Interlochen's artistic disciplines—music, theatre, dance, visual arts, creative writing, film and new media, and interdisciplinary arts—under the direction of theatre faculty member Gulshirin Dubash, Associate Director of Music for Contemporary Performance and Collaborative Projects Courtney Kaiser-Sandler and Theatre Design & Production Program Director Stephen John. Integrating original songs, poetry, spoken word, dance and film into the Interlochen Arts Academy's performance, ■■■■■■ : MUKTI explores liberation movements throughout history from all over the world. The directors explain:

"With the task of creating a program that assessed liberation on a global scale, spanning centuries and cultures, we delved into movements through music, theatre, dance, visual art, creative writing, and film and wove a web of intricately created moments. Students generated work that responded to the growing world around them as they understood it, however, keeping in mind the history that came before them and the truths that may not be theirs, but are nonetheless deeply felt and valid."

Interlochen Center for the Arts' President Trey Devey notes,

"We will explore liberation of all kinds from a global perspective that represents our diverse student body. The performance culminates in the possibility of hope and new considerations— an ending aptly created by the next generation of creative changemakers."

New York premieres and more from four living Black composers

After intermission, the student orchestra will perform side-by-side with members of the New York Philharmonic, many of whom are Interlochen alumni. Led by Interlochen's Dr. Leslie B. Dunner, they will interpret works by four living Black composers. Unburied, Unmourned, Unmarked: Requiem for Rice, in which John Wineglass explores the history of enslaved people in America, will receive its New York premiere, as will Equality, a work set to Maya Angelou's poetry by Interlochen alumnus Jonathan Bailey Holland. The program's second half is completed by Mary D. Watkins's Soul of Remembrance, a movement from her orchestral suite Five Movements in Color, and Valerie Coleman's Umoja, named for the Swahili word for "unity," which denotes the first day of Kwanzaa.

Announcement of inaugural class of NY Phil Interlochen Scholars

The names of the young New York artists chosen to attend Interlochen Arts Camp on full-tuition scholarships this summer will also be announced at the concert. Through the newly established NY Phil Interlochen Scholars program, these awardees have been chosen from 15 partner organizations in the New York community:
