Is it a rock concert? Modern dance? A plea for environmental action and the rights of Indigenous peoples? Cut the Sky by Marrugeku, Australia's preeminent dance theater ensemble of Indigenous and non-Indigenous artists, is all three. As soul singer Ngairé belts out tunes ranging from Nick Cave to Buffalo Springfield Australian "post-soul" music, Marrugeku's "incredibly expressive and visceral" dancers (The Guardian) form a band of climate change refugees struggling to survive another extreme weather event. Moving backward and forward in time, Cut the Sky meditates on humanity's frailty in the face of its own actions.
